What are the real causes for our climate crisis?
How are the dominant narratives taking us away from finding real solutions?
How to recognize truly sustainable solutions against many greenwashing solutions?
What are the alternatives available to us?
How well do you know your planet?
How do we anchor ourselves within the crises?

If you are grappling with these questions, know deep down that something is fundamentally wrong with our current systems and want to delve deeper into alternative narratives, this course will change many of your perspectives.
Earth & Us, an exploratory course by Centre for Gender and Environment, is designed to raise more questions than provide answers.

It aims to examine the fundamentals of our existing beliefs and systems, and our very connection to our selves, society, non-human beings and Earth – our home.
What the course will cover

- What is ecology and why is it necessary to have an ecological perspective now more than ever
- Understand the journey of the earth and the impact of humans on the planet
- Basics of ecological studies

- Current dominant narrative on climate change and the missing narratives
- Impact of climate change on communities
- Understanding current economic paradigm of growth (GDP) and energy consumption

- What is true sustainability
- Understanding how most solutions are mere greenwashing solutions
- Analysing our current ecological footprints

- Finding alternatives and exploring what is happening across the world
- Finding answers in indigenous spiritual traditions and knowledge systems
- How to anchor ourselves in the time of poly crises

The course includes four live sessions and an assignment that participants will have to present to complete the course. The course will be interactive with fun nature-based and other creative activities, and will provide a safe non-judgmental platform to discuss issues, thoughts, and observations. The participants will be provided with various resource materials and book/film recommendations that will add tremendous value while taking decisions in professional and personal lives.
